STATEMENT

I am a bioethicist and social scientist who employs empirical research to investigate ethical questions in biomedicine. My scholarly work focuses on the experiences and interactions of people who are stakeholders in biomedical research, innovation, and practice.

I have conducted research with genomic research participants, people who have refused research participation, families seeking or dealing with genetic diagnoses, and various stakeholders in new technologies for prenatal testing—including clinicians, test developers, pregnant women, and disability advocates. My work is informed by bioethical principles, social theory, and literatures on identity, race, gender, practice, narrative, and disability. I am currently co-editing a volume entitled Born Well: Prenatal Genomics and the Future of Having Children, under contract with Springer.

I also teach and mentor students, postdocs, and other trainees in topics related to bioethics, qualitative social science, and the responsible conduct of research.
